

POTTAGE

1

© 2026 by POTTAGE Literary Magazine

All rights reserved.

This journal includes works of fiction and creative nonfiction. Names, characters, places, and incidents either are the product of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously. Any resemblance to actual persons, living or dead, events, or locales is entirely coincidental. Some parts have been fictionalized in varying degrees, for various purposes. All works featured in this journal were created entirely without the use of artificial intelligence tools.

No portion of this journal may be reproduced in any form without written permission from the publisher or authors, except as permitted by U.S. copyright law.

POTTAGE Literary Magazine | pottagemag.com

CONTRIBUTOR BIOS

Kale Brand is a musician and composer currently teaching music in Chicago.

Alyson Lucas is a writer from Camarillo, California. She currently lives on the Southside of Chicago.

Will Nelson is a midwest based writer and a Writing and Publishing MFA student at DePaul University. His work has appeared in Block Club Chicago, Minnesota Monthly, Flavor Magazine, and Minnesota Conservation Volunteer. He currently lives in Uptown Chicago and is getting pretty good at rollerblading.

Anna Sladek is a unique & gifted artist with Down syndrome. She is pursuing her passion in life, which is painting. Her supportive family is behind her in this movement to share her artistic expression. Learn more about her story at annasartstore.com.

Gloria Sladek is a web developer and part time hobbyist based in Ohio.

Lucas Simone is a gardener in Chicago. His writing has appeared in Same Faces Collective, Thimble Literary Magazine, The Santa Clara Review, and elsewhere.

Fred Tackitt was a thespian, musician, sketch artist, philosopher, and writer from South Whitley, Indiana. His work is included in POTTAGE to honor his legacy as a beloved son, brother, and friend. You can find a collection of his writings, drawings, and performance photographs at <https://libguides.manchester.edu/archives/tackitt>.

EDITOR'S NOTE

Dear Reader,

POTTAGE is dedicated to misfits and scraps. As a literary magazine, preference is shown to literary works, but we accept any form of art that can be printed onto paper. POTTAGE seeks to platform artists of all skill levels and specializations, questioning what can be considered art or literature and what metrics a creator “should” be aiming for. We will always prioritize inclusivity, intersectionality, and interdisciplinary work.

I say “we” but, in truth, I am the sole member of the POTTAGE “team.” Growing increasingly frustrated with the publishing industry, the U.S. job market, and the scourge that is generative AI, I decided I would make my own opportunities: publishing experience for myself, publications for lesser-known artists, and a collection of human-made work for readers. While I am the only staff member, POTTAGE is a community-driven project, introducing me to some wonderful artists and giving me an excuse to reach out to old friends.

I believe the collective can empower the individual; I hope that, by curating various pieces, each one can shine a bit brighter. Further, no work is complete until it is perceived—an act which irrevocably changes it. As such, I must thank you, reader, for contributing to POTTAGE with your attention. Your support is priceless.

Sincerely,

Saint-Rowan Tackitt, Founding Editor

Table of Contents

Time to Frolic by Kale Brand	1
The Price by Gloria Sladek	2
Everything Has a Cost by Gloria Sladek	3
Several Parts of Me by Fred Tackitt	4
Beach House by Lucas Simone	5
The Universe by Anne Sladek	6
Dovetail by Alyson Lucas	7
Spider by Will Nelson	8
Mystic Ocean by Anne Sladek	9
Trust by Lucas Simone	10
Dumpling Soup by Will Nelson	11
Changeling by Gloria Sladek	12
Take Their Place by Gloria Sladek	13
Contributor Bios	14

Such a messy process by Gloria Sladek

Changeling

by Gloria Sladek

The pencil dropped from Farren's hand and she trembled with emotions. She had to make a plan, a way out. A final act. Yes. That's it, that's what she was good at.

Come on think, what would you do? How would Simara say goodbye?

James had said I love you tonight. This is always where she broke character. Always where she messed up the mission. Why was that? It wasn't like it changed anything, she was lying before just as much. But somehow these humans' desire for affection ruined her every time.

It was just so pitiful. Seeing them fall for something that wasn't real, seeing them enamor themselves in an act. No, somehow, after they said I love you... she always ran away.

But now she was in a pickle. This was the longest life Farren had lived in the human world and she needed to find an excuse for her departure fast. Something that would make sense to all of the people she'd met along the way. If she wanted any chance of being forgiven by the chicanery tribe again, she had to make a clean cut escape; her chances were slim as is.

Why'd I have to play a social butterfly this time?

Farren had been a problem child from birth. Most changelings were natural liars, or were kept unaware of their origins until they came of age. She, however, remembered where she was from—she remembered her true parents. She would often doodle them and ask when they were coming to get her. Luckily, Farren's human guardians brushed this off as an active imagination.

They wished they had gotten "help" when she went missing.

The chicanery had scolded her and sent her to a bootcamp to learn how to blend in with the humans. For many centuries, the changelings had perfected the art of taking on the role of humans. They were taught cautionary tales of changelings who lost their way, forgetting their true selves and withering away in the human world.

The older they got, the harder it would be to integrate into society unnoticed. When taking the place of a human who had already lived some life, made some connections, there was a lot more research involved. Because of this, each changeling tries to stay in one life for as long as they can while still reporting back to the tribe and maintaining their true selves.

Farren never quite understood why it was so easy for them. To go everyday being someone they weren't. Never truly being known by anyone. So many of them found joy in the experience, but Farren only felt disgust.

Time to Frolic

Kale Brand

Andante

4

7

10

13

15

Fine

1. 2. D.S. al Fine

Take a Deep Breath

by Gloria Sladek

Though the air may be clouded and your mind may be hazy, soon this will all make sense.

Why the war's wage on in and out of our minds, why so many mourn the deaths of those they love while we sit inside and dream of brighter days that may never come.

Take a breath because this is where we live. A painting that coats the blood soaked land that we stride on. The white curtains that hide the cloudy skies from the smoke of wars we turn our eyes from.

Take in a breath and close your eyes to the horrors you try not to face, as you hear the screams you turn up the sound of the music. Soon there will be better days.

Better days for some on the shoulders of others who fight to survive as they are pushed to the dirt. And we walk on like they are nothing to us with our designer shirts.

Take a deep breath as it may be your last as the smokey air causes your lungs to collapse. Take a deep breath and close your eyes, one last time.

Mystic Ocean by Anne Sladek

Dumpling Soup*by Will Nelson*

Today I made dumpling soup.

I'd rolled out the dumplings by hand on a cutting board on the other side of the kitchen from the stove top. Experimentally, I tossed one of them across the room and it splashed into the pot, sending a plume of soup splashing out over the counter.

I laughed, and threw another. Then a third. The fourth one missed, and the dumpling crumpled onto the formica. But I was already throwing a fifth.

I threw all eighteen dumplings. By the time I was finished, there was soup splattered all over the stove, against the kettle and the knife block, up onto the microwave, and I was laughing and smiling and feeling just wonderful.

I picked up the dumplings that lay mangled around the pot, and threw them into the soup. The one on the floor went in the garbage.

Then, I set about looking for some more fun to have, heedless of the destruction it might cause.

Everything has a cost by Gloria Sladek

Several Parts of Meby Fred Tackitt*

Between the several parts of me,
 I stand and watch them move,
 And wonder with the coming on
 Of night what sounds will prove
 To be the greatest ease to sleep:
 The thunder of a union
 Or the crash of seperation
 Or the quiet pensive tension
 That pervades the preservation
 Of the lone and lonely, individual
 Several Parts of Me.

* Poem titled by Manchester University archivists

Trust*by Lucas Simone*

The bus. I make eye contact with its subtle, almost-evening headlights and it begins to wink and move dreamily toward me. I close my book and bend to the backpack at my feet to slip it inside, and I'm still bent over when the bus slides into place against the curb, so close it brushes the hairs on the top of my head before stopping and kneeling with a small exhale. It's harmless, this massive machine. It's a dog or a child unafraid of social boundaries, coming to see if I'm okay. I board and walk to the back, steadying myself with poles, swishing against the arms of others' winter coats. I'm on my way to Howard Brown, where people will treat me with kindness. The person at the desk will smile, a physician will offer me free PrEP, the phlebotomist will find a vein on his first try and the tingling in my fingers will feel like champagne bubbles, an older woman will hand me a paper bag of clean needles.

This city takes care of me. Even the bus, with its bulk and exhaust, coming so close to what was once my soft spot, would never hurt me.

The Universe by Anne Sladek

Dovetail

by Alyson Lucas

I nosedived into lakewater and it's cold swallowed me whole.
 Felt memories permeate my skin, like blue, coagulated, thick. I shine now. Heavy, I shine.
 Anchor pressed to my forehead in prayer,
 she kisses me once on each cheekbone
 before saying goodbye.
 I look up and imagine quiet. Rehearse its sensation. Orchestrate my muscles to draw love in a crystallized outline.
 Muted eardrums mumble merry.
 My veins nerve and swell with salt.
 A dove flutters above the surface.
 Daffodil seeds lace her wings against the wind. I think about what it must feel like to feel light. Stranger to no one but myself.
 Dovetail.

Beach House*by Lucas Simone*

I drip water in the wax
 so the candle makes pops
 like the radio makes pops.
 My girl's hands smell like incense, her room
 like cup noodles.
 There's sand in our scalps.

HER: Does your goatee make you feel like a real person?

I'm on the floor, she's on the bed.
 She's holding her arms in the air
 and stroking them.

ME: It really does.

Because it really does.
 She gets me.

ME: I look just like my dad.
 I want to stand next to a wheelbarrow.

HER: My hips make me feel like a woman.
 They go in and out at the bone.
 And my tummy gathers
 under my bellybutton like a hand cupping water.
 It makes a shadow in my sun dresses.

ME: I've noticed that.

Because I have.
 My girl is gorgeous.

HER: My mom's tummy
 did that too.

I look up at the bed,
 which is lofted.
 A quilted altar.
 My girl is holding her arms in the air
 and stroking them.
 I stand,
 fingers in wax sarcophaguses,
 and kiss her.

Spider*by Will Nelson*

I saw a spider in the shower this morning.
 Blindly, two pale forelegs tapped curiously,
 Feeling out her next step as she spindled her way Along the mildewing drywall above the shower.
 I am not afraid of spiders, but my heartrate leapt.
 She was the grey-white of dead skin
 With mandibles the color of menstrual blood.
 There are no venomous spiders here,
 But still I found myself edging to the other side of the shower.
 My naked body, soft and pink from the hot water,
 Felt vulnerable in front of her raptorial gracefulness.
 A deep instinct compelled me to keep an eye
 on her.
 She inched her way down the wall
 And slipped on the damp slickness of the acrylic shower panel.
 All eight legs splayed and flailing wildly
 She fell for almost a foot before stopping to hang suspended in mid-air.
 Twisting, focused.
 Each appendage searched independently for some kind of purchase.
 Finding none, they all fell still.
 Now only inches from my face,
 I looked at her motionless form, so flawless in design.
 I wondered what I would have done if she had fallen into the churning water below.

Would I have succumbed to panic
 And brushed her quickly down the drain with my foot
 So that I could continue my shower in comfort?
 Or would I have bent to pick her up?
 I indulged to imagine her nestled gratefully in my palm.
 Or, would she have sunk her dark mandibles into my fragile skin?
 I watched her dance her way back up to the ceiling.
 I turned off the shower.
 If I ignored her, one of my roommates was sure to see her
 And her dignified, athletic body
 Would end up a smear of organs in a crumpled tissue.
 Maybe I would trap her in a ceramic mug, Flick her out the back door before washing the mug out with soap.
 And she would freeze in hours.
 Or perhaps I should bring her to my room,
 And allow her to hunt fruitlessly for prey
 through the winter months
 Until I find her behind the radiator
 With all eight legs curled lifelessly towards the heavens.
 Would it be more kind,
 I asked myself, squeezing leave-in conditioner
 from a plastic tube
 To kill her right then?
 Instead, I turned out the bathroom lights
 And went to bed.